To whom it may concern,

I met Jessica Muise at a community event where she was the keynote speaker promoting work she has been doing in Portland, Maine to integrate more public art across the city. Upon our first meeting I found Jess to be kind, smart, easy to talk to and really understanding of what struggles and obstacles artists face. She agreed to meet with me about a week later, outside of the normal purview of her position, and counsel me on some public art initiatives I was working on. After one hour of Jess sharing her brain with me I was able to create a sponsorship packet and template that has already secured enough funding to complete the proposed project! She not only helped with that one project but has supplied me with the tools to create a template that I can employ for future projects as well. In my humble opinion the world could use a lot more folks like Jessica. She is a true champion of the arts, and of artists and I am incredibly lucky to have met her and been the recipient of her generosity and insight.
